On Beginnings

Essays · June 15, 2026

Every collection has a first page, and the first page is always a little dishonest. It pretends the work started here, on this date, with this sentence — when in truth the writing began long before, in fragments and false starts that never earned a filename.

This is a sample entry. Replace it with your own. The system reads any Markdown file you drop into writings/essays/ and places it in the collection by date, so the order takes care of itself.

The order of a life is only visible in retrospect; chronology is the kindest fiction we tell about it.

A few things this format supports, so you can write naturally:

- Italic and bold for emphasis.
- Section headings within a piece.
- Block quotes, like the line above.

A heading inside the essay

Paragraphs are justified and set in a serif face, the way a printed book would set them. Write as long or as short as you like — each file is one piece, and each piece finds its own place in time.

The sea keeps no calendar
and still arrives on time, laying its thin grey ledger
along the same torn line.

What it takes, it takes slowly —
a name, a step, a stone — and what it gives back wholly is the patience to go on.

A sample poem — replace it with your own work; line breaks are preserved.
